Fumbles can’t kill the government’s AI appetite

In recent examples of chatbots going rogue New York City’s much-lauded chatbot was caught giving inaccurate and unlawful advice. In Queensland, the State Library’s AI war veteran chatbot “Charlie” was hacked to impersonate Doctor Who, Frasier Crane and a ditzy blonde.

These institutions should be applauded for not scuttling their inventions at the first whiff of controversy. The most detrimental impact of stifling innovation in government is that service delivery stagnates. To ensure this doesn’t happen, we need to move away from the propensity to pause AI innovation rather than risk public embarrassment.

These early fumbles are an essential part of the innovation process. The ability to push through and learn from mistakes will ensure that service delivery continues to reach the segments of society that need it most. We should all be rooting for AI innovation in government with appropriate guardrails.

Let’s chat with Charlie

Through Live at the Library and Virtual Veterans State Library of Queensland is building connections for regional schools to its collections and resources; forging gaps for regional schools.

We dare to push these initiatives forward to bring vibrant and relevant services to teachers and students and aim to remain innovative stay ahead of the curve and create value

for the communities we serve.
